

J-Entry

It's not a living group; it's a living philosophy. Just kidding!

It's honestly really difficult to describe J Entry's culture in just a few sentences or paragraphs. We really are a diverse bunch of people. Our residents include track athletes and programmers and hip-hop dancers and physicists and marathon runners and gastronomically gifted chefs, and not-so-gifted chefs. What ties us all together is our sense of family. We're the smallest entry in MacGregor, which makes us quite close. There are always people working in the lounges, and you can always find someone in J when you need to talk or just be around people.

J Entry has a lot of traditions and we're always looking for new things that will become traditions in the future, like the Easter Piñata, Thanksgiving dinner, weekly brownie night, Christmas gift exchange, J-Idol, and senior dinner.

During our weekly study breaks you'll find us eating, playing games, watching movies, and enjoying each other's company. Our very own mythical creature, the birthday fairy, will bring you cake for your birthday. (The fairy lives underneath the J entry holiday bush).

J Entry is a home away from home. The whole group feels like a family, with all that family entails. We've got the crazy uncles, the siblings who love to give each other a hard time, the eccentric parents. But in spite of how different we all are, we're always here for each other; whether for helping each other get through a tough time, or just for hanging out on a weekend.

Through the good and bad, study breaks and all nighters, you will always find a friend here. J-entry is a place to return to when you want to be alone or somewhere to find someone to talk to when you need advice. MIT is hard, but luckily you don't have to face it alone.
